S&P affirms Mexico 'BBB' rating, with a negative outlook

- S&P Global Ratings ratified Mexico's sovereign long-term foreign currency credit rating at 'BBB', with a negative outlook
- The agency stated that Mexico will maintain a cautious macroeconomic management. They highlight the expectation of stable debt levels, prudent fiscal and monetary policies, and a solid external position, among others
- However, the outlook remains negative as the pandemic has affected GDP growth, some pressures weigh on the investment climate (both old and new), and public finances have weakened on challenges related to Pemex
- With this action, the three main agencies have ratified the country's credit rating recently. We reiterate our view that Mexico will remain an investment grade issuer in the short- and medium-term

S&P Global Ratings ratifies Mexico's sovereign rating. Today, the agency ratified Mexico's long-term sovereign rating on a global scale at 'BBB'. The last time they made an announcement was quite similar, in December 2020, joining recent statements by Fitch Ratings and Moody's Investors Service, which also reaffirmed the rating. They stated that the President and his allies will continue with a simple majority in Congress after the midterm elections, so "...they remain well positioned to advance the policy agenda in the second part of his six-year term...". In this backdrop, they see Mexico maintaining a cautious management with stable debt levels, prudent fiscal and monetary policies (with no changes expected after the latest appointments at the MoF and Banxico) and a solid external position, among others. However, the outlook remains negative, so the rating could be downgraded in the next twelve months. Risks to public finances (due to the expectation of higher support to Pemex) and less fiscal space in a low GDP growth environment stand out. The latter has been affected by the pandemic, along pressures on the investment climate (both old and new), especially for the private sector. In this sense, limiting contingent liabilities and broader initiatives of fiscal reform could prevent an erosion of the country's financial profile. We reiterate our view that Mexico will remain an investment-grade country, with a low risk of a near term downgrade.
